The first MMO that features 3D dungeons, 3D and 2D character models, large-scale landscapes, and an expansive world. ● Gyges, Lord of the Realms, seeks your aid in sending a message to the King of Tarnage to offer assistance. The story will unfold as a fantasy drama in which you are a central character, and you will navigate through a large, three-dimensional world using your own character. ●

The Theme of the Game You will find yourself in a world at the crossroads of legend and modernity in the late 20th century, where the world is full of magic. Full of contradictions, the world is dominated by Tarnage, a civilization in the midst of the Dark Age, wielding absolute power over all other countries. Tarnage's realm, the Lands Between, is a land where civilization has not yet fully materialized, filled with large valleys and boundless mountains, mountains that are petrified and only come to life at night. In addition to Tarnage, a powerful civilization that has lost its knowledge, there is another existence in the world. A legend in which the Elden Ring, a legendary circle of power, plays a central role. These two civilizations have been in conflict for thousands of years, and the Lands Between have become the battleground between them. Players who settle the Lands Between are the Lord of the Realms, and will rise as legendary heroes.

Elden Ring [Updated]

From /u/TheDickfu: Now I've never played a game like this. For one, it's online which means finding other players, finding games and most importantly finding leagues. On top of that, it's no fucking ingame tutorial. It's let's say, a mystery box for new players. I like the visuals a lot. It's not a typical RPG from Square Enix, it has a rather comic book look to it and it's quite bright with a vibrant colour scheme. This game is quite simply, a great looking game. Character building is a bit of a shame, being as it's different to anything I've seen before. You build your own character and then there are the stats. Every character comes with a set of 6 different stats of varying levels. As you level up, the stats upgrade and your stats can be changed which kind of messes with the original character building. You have to guess what you want and see if it makes sense from there. Each class has three different skills for the first skill set and the second skill set is a choice between two different choices. Overall though, the options to build your character are a bit...fucked. There's basically no way to build a warrior that resembles a warrior. For all the different weapons and ability combinations, the only way to build a powerful fighter is to guess what the class is like and guess what they want to use. It's done to a degree by the stats and the weapon sets but there's no way to plan the stats this way. Beyond the character building and skills, I like the customization of the items you can equip. The first time I saw this, it was some red cloth that was being used as a cape and looked cool. For some reason, a cape wasn't seen as standard after that. Eventually I made my way up to being able to purchase new equipment and weapons. This is where it gets cool. While you can level up a class and get better equipment, you're stuck with whatever equipment you put into them. Equipment can be leveled up by defeating enemies and eventually getting better. Equipment levels out after a while but there's no reason to level up a piece of equipment because it doesn't do anything unless its stats are changed. One thing I don't like is the camera. We are third person with a traditional camera. The camera angles are weird and it's just really hard to determine if your character is facing the right direction
